

FCC should not be in the business of regulating content. Parents who care are capable of regulating viewing by children; those who don't care are falling down on the job in so many other ways that having children watching any form of TV is better than what they might be doing otherwise. Effect of the programming that FCC can regulate is trivial compared to exposure that they cannot regulate. Adults are capable of regulating their own viewing and have no business restricting viewing choices available to other adults. If the government wants to play parent, there are plenty much more useful ways it could be doing so - beginning with prosecuting all manner of existing violations of law that lead children and others to believe that selectively breaking laws is a constitutional right of individuals.
